A project guided by Tatiana Heuman & Florencia Curci
(and in collaboration with many others)

Siestaria is an artistic research project that explores listening as a bridge between the intermediate states of wakefulness and sleep. We approach a reflection on what we call the politics of rest. As sound artists and composers, we create sound experiences through workshops, installations, long-duration concerts for sleeping audiences, collective siestas, and radio pieces, in which participants engage in practices of listening and dream translation.

Our research is based on rituals, stories, and songs associated with sleep as compositional tools and performative practices. We approach dreams as technology, understood and used differently in different cultures and disciplines, with the potential to connect, imagine, and re-signify the world we inhabit. We consider radical rest and dreamlike listening as methods capable of exerting a counterforce to capitalist frameworks that reduce sleep to merely a resource for productivity. The dream space becomes an acoustic refuge, a realm of involuntary gestures, where experimental forms of listening, sonic intimacy, and undisciplined logics of thinking and doing can emerge.

A long-form (5 hs) radio piece that invites listeners on a journey of sensory exploration.

Over the course of five hours, it combines organic and digital soundscapes that interact with the spoken word. During the creative process, we implemented text (de)construction dynamics that we extracted from the logic of the language of our dreams.

The piece invites collective dreamlike synchronicity and communal sleep: we invite you to listen to the broadcast simultaneously with others to connect in dreams and share them upon awakening.

The texts are ours, originally in Spanish and English and translated into German.

Meditative electroacoustic piece developed in the peri-urban landscapes near Stuttgart (Germany).

While spending time in a garden, we observed how rest is often framed as recovery, a way to recharge in order to return to the rhythms of productivity. We also realized that the search for relaxation in contact with nature that takes place in the garden space is often intertwined with work, control, and maintenance. Mowing the lawn became a condensed gesture of this paradox: the garden as a refuge and as a task. In this piece, we take the hum of lawnmower engines—machines designed to tame growth—and shift their function toward inner drift. We propose a slow detuning of the utilitarian, reusing the hum of the engine as a portal to altered states. It is not a silence of work, but a resonant space where perception softens, where rest is not recovery but resistance, a quiet and vibrant threshold where other rhythms, other imaginaries can emerge.

Texts in English.

Most of the recordings used in this piece were made at Keingarten.xyz in August 2024.
